Our climate is changing, impacting energy and energy planning. Future challenges are already being addressed in different ways around the world and here in Arizona. On January 10, 2017, with a new federal administration in place, we will be presented with a timely opportunity to look toward Arizona's energy future. Globally, we see cities, states, tribal communities and countries all actively choosing to participate in decisions that impact our climate and shared future. Dr. Claudia Kemfert, Berlin's Hertie School of Governance, will start the conversation by delivering Keynote remarks on "The Economic Chances of an Energy Transition" from Germany's ambitious approach embracing renewables while planning to decommission nuclear reactors by 2022. The panel will span this range of perspectives, allowing the panel to address timely questions such as the fate of the Clean Power Plan and the level of city and state leadership needed to address community resilience to increasing risks.
